

Information about the Educational Research Institute in an easy-to-read and understand text

The Educational Research Institute is a place where scientists research various matters relating to education and science. They do research, which means that they try to find out as much as possible about something. For example, they want to find out how people learn or how to effectively teach people. They do research in different ways, for example by asking many people the same questions. When you get a lot of answers, you can find out if something is working well or not. This allows whatever you are researching to be improved or corrected. Another word for “research” is “study”.

The Educational Research Institute studies learning at school, but not only. We learn at school, but we can also learn by reading books, watching films, and developing our interests. We learn while working, when we take courses and attend training. Both children and adults learn.

Learning allows us to get different skills that can be useful in life and work. The Educational Research Institute does research on which skills are needed in various professions and then describes them in detail. This allows everyone to find out what they need to do to work in a specific profession. Also abroad.

Research is done in many countries on how students learn at school. Later, the Institute compares the results of these studies with Polish studies. Thanks to this, we know what is good in Polish schools and what is worth changing. We want students to enjoy learning and teachers to enjoy their work.

The Educational Research Institute also produces books on education, work and lifelong learning. Most of these books can be downloaded for free from the Institute's website.

The Educational Research Institute is located in Warsaw, Poland at 8 Górczewska Street.

The Institute is open from Monday to Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m.
